The 45-Minute Weekly Recording

Record once a week, post every day. The exact template I give the coaches I work with.

Why one session beats daily posting

Recording every day means deciding what to say every day. That's why most people quit within two weeks.

One focused session a week removes the daily decision. You show up once, your audience sees you every day.

Before you start

- Block 45 minutes in your calendar, same day every week.
- Set up light, phone at eye level, quiet room (see the checklist).
- Keep this template open next to the camera.
- Record each answer as its own take. Pause between them.

The 45 minutes

Minutes 0 to 10: client questions

Answer 3 questions clients or followers asked you this week. One take per question, 1 to 2 minutes each.

> Start every answer with the answer, not the context.

Minutes 10 to 20: one mistake

Pick one mistake you keep seeing. Explain what it is, why people make it, and what to do instead.

Minutes 20 to 30: one story

Tell one short story from your work. What happened, what you learned, what changed for the client.

Minutes 30 to 45: your opinions

React to something in your field. What do you disagree with? What do people get wrong? Say it clearly.

Prompts when you're stuck

- What did a client struggle with this week?
- What do you wish clients knew before they hired you?
- What's a question you answer again and again?
- What's one thing you changed your mind about?
- What result did a client get, and what made the difference?
- What's the first step you give every new client?
- What's a myth in your industry you want to kill?

After the session

1. Send the raw files to your editor (or edit them yourself).
2. Each answer becomes one short video with its own hook.
3. Schedule them across the week.
4. Next week, same time, same template.

> One recording. A week of content. No daily stress.
